An organization's culture of teamwork and unity is often formed and nourished in the personal interactions that take place in hallways and around water coolers and coffee machines. We often depend on the office space itself and the energy created by managers and employees in that work environment to cultivate the positive work atmosphere that helps the organization succeed.

When an organization is required to go virtual, many of these informal venues are eliminated and thus that sense of teamwork can suffer.

This can result in silo mentalities, poor internal communication, different divisions pulling in different directions, poor performance, and higher rates of employee turnover, to name a few....

In this webinar, we will dissect what specific factors determine culture and what you can do as a leader to nourish and build the culture your organization needs for success, even in a remote working environment.

Understanding the different factors that determine culture and how they can be fine-tuned is critical for any leader wishing to take an active role in crafting a culture of success.
